Urban change being studied

The Milton-Park Citizens' Committee is currently considering a two-year study of urban change to be carried on by residents, students and professional services.

A planning program discussed at last night's meeting of the Committee called for "the establishment of an urban community planning and decision-making process within the community."

Student help for the study comes in the form of the McGill School of Architecture's Community Design Workshop. Such student cooperation "is considered an important component of the overall community planning experience," according to a MPCC report.

The main professional services would be provided by Arcop Associates, Architects and Urban designers. Some Committee members were hesitant about "citizens working in conjunction with outside professionals."

However, Ray Affleck, representing Arcop, assured the Committee that the company would support it in any confrontation with the municipal government.

Noting that the city's Planning Department "would tend to be difficult with any citizens' group," he promised that Arcop, acting on the committee's behalf, would receive better treatment from the city.

In the past, the municipal government has been far from cooperative with citizens' committees. It is known to be allied with Concordia Estates Ltd., a company whose private urban renewal scheme depended upon the demolition of the Milton-Park area. This area at the moment provides the only good low-cost housing near the center of the city.

Despite "the desperate need for low rental housing," close to 15,000 units of low-income accommodations have been torn down in recent years. "Tenants from the demolished apartments have been forced out of their neighborhoods, thereby causing overcrowding and difficulties elsewhere," the MPCC report states.

The Milton-Park Citizens' Committee was formed in 1968 to combat Concordia.

The company planned to replace the area's low-income accommodations with high-rise apartments, a hotel, and a shopping concourse, to be humbly known as "Cite Concordia".

However, the inability of Concordia to find sufficient financial backing and the extensive publicity and pressure by the Citizens' Committee has led to continual postponements of the initial phase of construction.

Since then, the MPCC has become a forum for active community involvement in urban change.

It has established a medical clinic, a community workshop, two summer festivals and a non-profit community corporation of 313 members.

The Committee is based upon the belief that residents, despite very different social, ethnic, economic and occupational backgrounds, "are best able to assess and determine the basic needs of their neighborhood".

Young Alumni discuss youth

The summer reruns have hit McGill early this year.

Last night in the Leacock Building, David Hunter, Charles Lynch, Eigil Pedersen, and Richard Pomerantz replayed their discussion on the Report of the Committee on Youth. They had participated in a similar discussion September 30 at the Saidye Bronfman Centre.

The only difference this time was that there was another debater taking part: Harvey Schacter, editor of the McGill News.

The Youth Report was commissioned by the Secretary of State, Gerard Pelletier, and is a study of "the aspirations, attitudes, and needs of youth and of the government's present role in this area".

Most of its recommendations, however, are vague and merely advise that more study be done. At one point, for example, the Report says that a "significant transformation of the Canadian economic system" is needed, but it does not specify what kind of transformation.

The Report also makes the mistake of lumping all youth together as a homogeneous group who are opting out of society in frustration and disillusionment; it makes little mention of those youths who conform to society's norms or of those who are actively trying to change them.

Lynch, who is chief of Southam News Services, carried his wholesale attack on the Report over from the Saidye Bronfman discussion into this one. He reiterated that the Report has "overtones of the FLQ manifesto" and again criticized the Youth Committee for legitimizing the "radical demands of youth" by "quoting them approvingly" in an official government document.

As he did at the Saidye Bronfman Centre, Lynch defended the Canadian way of life as "one of the most efficient economic and political systems in the world," and he again assailed the Report for describing "this whole system as rotten".

This time, Lynch also complained that "no one cares about the English-speaking people in Quebec, who are a powerless minority".

Hunter, who was Chairman of the Committee on Youth, continued his attempt to defend the Report. At the Saidye Bronfman discussion, he had rebutted Lynch's claims that the Report is revolutionary by admitting that its recommendations are "very conservative."

Last night, he stated emphatically that the Report is "not radical and not revolutionary".

Hunter also admitted that the Report is not very specific about solutions to the problems it outlined and explained that this is because "we didn't have the answers."

McGill Students' Society President Pomerantz tried to maintain his position between those of Lynch and Hunter. He said that many of the Report's recommendations are "unjustifiable", but did not go along with Lynch's total attack on it.

As he did in the Saidye Bronfman discussion, Pomerantz criticized the "exaggerated emphasis" placed on youth by the Report and by politicians in general.

He also managed to get in a complaint about McGill students receiving less money from the Opportunities for Youth program than did the French CEGEP students.

Schacter was hardly more noticeable at last night's discussion than at the one at the Saidye Bronfman Centre. His only real comment was that he found the Youth Report dull.

STAFF LAYOFFS in the Redpath Library have led to frustrating line-ups for students who need to use the library's facilities for their term papers. The circulation desk has been closed down and students now have to wait for the limited number of librarians in the Reserve Department to serve them. The layoffs come on the heels of attempts by some librarians to unionize the workers.

Protests rise against SGWU trials

by cherry cross

The McGill Student Movement yesterday held a rally to express its support for Martin Bracey's denunciation of the courts which last week convicted him of depriving Sir George Williams University of the use of its private property.

The rally, held in the Union lobby, attracted many students.

"Some people who want to let the example of Martin Bracey go unnoticed say we're a bunch of troublemakers and agitators. Well, they're right," said the first MSM speaker.

"We intend to show what can be learnt from the case of Martin Bracey and agitate in support of his cause. We intend to make trouble for all those who stand for fascism and racism."

Another speaker outlined the facts of the Sir George computer center incident of 1969. He denounced the racism and treachery of the Sir George administration in breaking off negotiations and forcing a fight, and praised those who, like Bracey, had stood up and battled the oppressor.

(Last Friday, Bracey was sentenced to two years for "malicious obstruction" in connection with the computer center occupation. He was also given the choice of paying a $2,000 fine or spending another twelve months in jail.

This sentence, added to the numerous "contempt" citations passed by trial judge Kenneth Mackay, means that Bracey will spend the next five years and four months in prison.)

A third speaker at yesterday's rally outlined Bracey's history of fighting oppression without regard for himself.

Bracey and other communists had taken the lead in putting into practice the "stand-up-and-fight" line of resistance as opposed to the "stay-out-of-jail" line of self-preservation.

Other speakers praised Bracey's actions as an example of the militant struggle waged by national minority peoples against U.S. imperialism.

Abortion laws to be fought

Women around the world are planning an International Day of Protest against the Abortion Laws.

The protest which will involve women from Canada, the United States, England, France, Germany and New Zealand, has been scheduled for November 20.

Last Sunday an abortion conference held in Montreal included representatives from women's groups across the city.

McGill women were represented by a large contingent of members from the McGill Committee for Abortion Law Repeal.

Committee members led the discussion in the University Women's workshop and gave practical information to women from other campuses on the mechanics of developing effective local committees to press for abortion reform.

The University Women's workshop recommended that local committees be established at every campus in the city.

These campus committees would also be responsible for developing plans of action in different high schools in Montreal.

One of the guest speakers at the conference was Dr. Paul

Gillette, a gynecologist at the Montreal General Hospital, who described the current abortion situation at the hospital as "critical."

No appointments for abortions are available at the Montreal General until December 24, due to the hospital's policy of limiting abortions to 15 a week.

While recognizing that every doctor dislikes the idea of interrupting a potential life, Gillette termed the alternative "unworkable."

This unworkable alternative involves the loss of life from unsafe illegal abortions, and the lack of a universally safe contraceptive for women.

It was pointed out that the maternal mortality rate in New York, in the first year since abortion became available on request, has been halved.

Gillette said that women should pressure doctors into accepting their obligation to perform abortions. He said that if every gynecologist in Quebec performed only two abortions a week, the demand would be satisfied.

Another speaker at the conference was a representative from the Front Commun pour l'abrogation des Lois sur l'avortement, who pointed out that all the legal abortions performed last year in Quebec only amounted to 1.7 percent of the birth rate, while the estimated demand for abortions equalled 25 percent of the birth rate. The other 23.3 percent received illegal, possible deadly abortions, or were forced to have unwanted children.

The representative from the Front Commun also mentioned that the law as it stands discriminates against French-speaking women since French hospitals are also generally Catholic and are not compelled by law to establish abortion review boards (the only way an abortion can be sanctioned legally).

Women in rural areas are in a similar position since the law requires that abortions be performed in accredited hospitals. Only half of the hospitals in Canada meet the standards of accreditation, and these are generally confined to metropolitan areas.

The November 20 action is seen as only one part of the campaign to repeal the abortion laws. Many other intermediate actions are planned by individual groups within the Women's Coalition for Abortion Law Repeal.

Although the repeal of the abortion laws is the ultimate goal, plans are being made for specific actions that will pressure hospitals into applying the present laws as liberally as possible.
